To address this issue, we investigate the use of Convolutional Neural Networks (CNNs) combined with a Generative Adversarial Network (GAN) to generate data-driven artificial images and label them by an expert for use in semi-supervised training. Methods: Experiments were conducted on a large publicly available dataset of three-dimensional CT images of brain tumors with associated MRI and/or pathology. CNN weights were initialized with the weights of a pretrained VGG network while GAN weights were learned from both real and synthetic data. This generated a surrogate model for the task of brain tumor segmentation. Results: We obtained state-of-the-art results, achieving mean Dice Similarity Coefficient (DSC) scores of 83.7% (0.79 Dice) for a 2D segmentation problem and 87.7% (0.8 Dice) for a 3D segmentation problem. GAN training was also compared with 3-way bootstrapping with hard labels and soft labels. Using GAN training achieved a test DSC score of 84.8% (0.76 Dice). The success of this approach lies in the use of the pretrained CNN, which reinforces robustness in the face of noise and high diversity in brain tumor image texture. Moreover, a comparison of the validation score of a 3D gradient-based CNN with that of a 2D CNN, with an additional pretrained U-net network as the expert system, demonstrated an improvement in performance for the 3D CNN (0.74 Dice) compared to the 2D CNN (0.69 Dice). Conclusions: We propose an approach using a pre-trained CNN in conjunction with a GAN to generate synthetic data for the task of brain tumor segmentation. The proposed method compares favorably against 3-way bootstrapping and outperforms the 2D CNN.' author: - Aleksandra Kicinski - Alexander Kilas - 'Alexander G. Recently my friend named Ding Ding in Korea had the opportunity to use the spicy chicken. Ding Ding is told that there are no spicy in Korea it's spicy! The moment he opened the door of the hot food shop, he felt things spicier than his spicy. From the moment Ding Ding takes the spicy chicken just seems to melt in his mouth. And when the bitterness was hot fingers lightly to the tongue, Ding Ding felt 570a42141b
