Adult olfactory sensory neurons (OSNs) respond to many odorants that differ in their physicochemical properties, such as odor threshold, odor intensity, and aroma of the odor quality. OSN responses are dependent on a number of physiological, anatomical, and molecular factors, including the number of OSNs, specific odorant affinity, and the number of odorant-binding sites (OBS) in the olfactory epithelium. Whether a given odorant reaches OSNs, and whether OSNs respond to it, is still unclear. Also unclear is whether a given OSN might respond to more than one odorant or a single odorant to a range of concentrations. In this report we have used an objective, quantitative, and quantitative software-based approach to better understand how odorants reach the OSNs, and to examine what mechanisms may be responsible for the OSNs' differential responses to odorants. Using this approach, we have shown that odorants reaching the OSNs are highly selective, and not randomly mixed. We have also shown that a single OS 1d6a3396d6
