relates to a waveguide structure capable of propagating a wave both in its Y direction and its X direction, more specifically to a waveguide structure capable of propagating a wave in its wide band. To solve problems of occupying a large space for radio devices and to reduce their cost, studies have been carried out on an integrated planar circuit in which a plurality of circuit parts are formed on a monocrystalline silicon substrate. However, a monocrystalline silicon substrate has a limit in the frequency of operation thereof. Because a semiconductor such as a silicon monocrystalline substrate contains a lot of impurities, the loss thereof increases as its frequency of operation becomes higher. A waveguide has been used in place of the monocrystalline silicon substrate to lower the loss thereof and to increase the frequency of operation thereof.

A waveguide is such an apparatus comprising a substrate and a metal layer covering the substrate and having conductivity, that propagates a wave. To make the waveguide operate in a wide band, its substrate is formed with grooves with a sufficient depth and the metal layer is formed with slots in its part where the grooves are formed. Conventionally, a substrate for a waveguide is formed with grooves which are deep enough and metal of low resistance is used as the substrate and the metal layer to form the waveguide. Therefore, the change in permittivity of the substrate at its resonant frequency is excessively large and a considerable amount of a wave propagated in the substrate is dissipated through its walls, so that the reflection loss becomes high. The object of the present invention is to provide a waveguide which does not reflect a wave to a substantial degree. The waveguide structure of the present invention comprises a substrate for a waveguide, a conductive layer covering the substrate, a slit formed in the conductive layer, and one or more grooves having a substantially rectangular cross section formed in the substrate, wherein an electrostatic capacity of a capacitance formed between the substrate and the slit is made to be substantially equal to an electrostatic capacity of a capacitance formed between the substrate and a ground plane, so that the substrate is ground. In the waveguide of the present invention, the effect of

---
