In a case that promises to have a profound effect on Indiana and nationwide, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit announced its opinion in Maywood N.D. v. Bay Drain, Inc., a case involving a challenge brought by the United States Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers (USACE) permit that allows Bay Drain Energy LLC to operate a coal-fired power plant in Porter County, Indiana. In the long run, the decision could affect other power plants throughout the U.S. that rely on the Clean Water Act to operate. On May 4, the Seventh Circuit affirmed the decision of the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Indiana, which previously struck down the permit and found in favor of Bay Drain. In appealing the permit denial, EPA raised two main points. The first is that the USACE improperly required Bay Drain to obtain a National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System (NPDES) permit rather than a Nationwide Permit Center (NWP) permit. Bay Drain, on the other hand, claimed that the USACE did not have jurisdiction over its emission of ammonia and sulfur dioxide under the Clean Water Act because the pollutants are relatively light in weight and typically do not migrate to other states or to surface waters. In upholding the district court's decision, the appeals court reached a resolution on both points, affirming the district court's finding of jurisdiction for Bay Drain and stating that the emissions of ammonia and sulfur dioxide were covered by the Clean Water Act. The second point that EPA made in the appeals court case was that USACE failed to evaluate all of the harm that Bay Drain's construction of a new coal-fired power plant would have on the quality of the area's waterways. The appeals court confirmed that this second point also merits a finding in the agency's favor. However, the court did not set the amount of damage that USACE could have caused
