What is the need of having multiple user accounts then? If one person is using a computer or even a phone and another is using it for a different purpose, it's possible that, at some point, these accounts can be confused. For example, one can be used for online shopping, or for playing games, and another to research something or even to reply to a friend by email. Gmail only allows a single account to access emails. Facebook allows multiple users, some of them with the same name. Also, different devices can have the same user account. It's not always a bad thing though, as you can enter the separate one for work and entertainment, and have them fully separated.

Having two user accounts is not too hard if you know how to use them. Create as many user accounts that you want. Of course, you're free to use the official Gmail sign-in page, but if you want to use a different

Gmail sign-in account, then open it using the URL: Take note of this because, afterward, you have to send someone a mail to recover this password. This "add" link is a link to the secure username (mail) and the password. You will have to forward someone else the "add" link. Send a message like this: Add to my gmail. If you ever get the message that the person already exists and there's a link to add to his or her account, then use another link to reset the password. Tips You can create a username that you find amusing, or a username that someone else uses. Don't use the same username on different accounts, as this will create confusion for anyone trying to access multiple accounts. To get the sign-in URL, open your profile, and click on "my account". On the top right corner, you have the option to select a different account. You will need this URL to sign in. You can generate new Gmail addresses, or pick existing ones from your Google Contacts. There are also numerous Gmail Addresses that come with the service. If you want to import your contacts, then you have to use the import feature that is available on this page. If
