Optical parametric oscillators generate light over a finite range of wavelengths. In particular, they emit light, and in general, the emission wavelength is restricted by the input wavelength of the optical parametric oscillator. The output energy may then be extracted by coupling the output to an optical parametric oscillator, which may provide wavelength conversion to longer wavelengths. Such wavelength conversion depends upon the optical parametric oscillator, which may determine the efficacy and efficiency of the conversion. The current optical parametric oscillator designs rely on resonant cavities with mirrors aligned at near-critical angles to enable mode-locking.

Such designs have limitations in that use of the available components with similar (or almost identical) critical angle requirements may result in optical components that are too large in size, and the alignment of the resonant cavities is likely to be difficult, particularly for the optimum design. Further, it is difficult to incorporate mirrors (in all but planar devices) if the input and output are not parallel. Alternatively, optical parametric oscillators can be designed in which the output light is coupled through a non-critical angle and the resultant critical angle is non-critical in size. However, designs with non-critical angles may require the input and output to be at least substantially parallel, and the pumping light is then reflected and absorbed in the output. To realize a small critical angle, the non-critical angle device must be relatively long, leading to difficulties with maintaining alignment and the input. The use of partially or fully reflective surfaces (see U.S. Pat. No. 5,936,107 to Markstaller) or systems of multiple mirrors coupled by a single optical fiber (see U.S. Pat. No. 6,069,960 to Perekalov) may be used to convert light emitted by the device. Such devices, however, still have the disadvantages of large sizes, requiring complex systems for coupling the light into the device, and the generation of small critical angles may require components that are too large to be easily manufactured. A need therefore exists for an optical parametric oscillator in which the device can be easily manufactured. A need also exists for an optical parametric oscillator that can be efficiently pumped. A need further exists for an optical parametric oscillator with components that are small in e79caf774b

Unusual mould growth at a psychiatric hospital. In a study of mould growth at a psychiatric hospital, 73 cases were identified that had occurred from February 2004 to February 2006. The hospital was a 41-bed unit in an urban, inner-city setting. The overall percentage of patients affected was 7.8%. The most commonly cultured species were Cladosporium, Aspergillus and Alternaria, with 25, 20 and 18 patients respectively being identified. The majority of isolates were only identified to genus level (71%). No clinically significant mould infections were encountered. Despite the findings, many of the patients and staff were exposed to potentially contaminated environments on a daily basis. OCA-NS-1378BK_1 The OCA-NS-1378A Self-Contained Trauma Services Wound Management System is a modular system that can be interfaced to a vehicle or aircraft medic bag for the rapid triage and treatment of combat casualties. The Wound Management System (WMS) is a rapidly deployable self-contained trauma kit that provides medical care to injured combatants and victims of gunshot wounds, penetrating injuries, blast injuries, road traffic accidents, and other wounds requiring wound care. The system also works in conjunction with the Automated External Defibrillator (AED) to provide automated external defibrillation for victims of cardiac arrest. The components of the WMS system include the OCA-NS-1378A Patient Care Module (PCM), the OCA-NS-1378W/O Class IIA Wound Management Set, the OCA-NS-1378A Air Operations Instruction Module (AOIM), and the OCA-NS-1378BK Mobile Blood Collection Kit (BK-MCV). Operating in a vehicle, the WMS provides a medical recovery environment that can be rapidly deployed to achieve the proper sterile and appropriate environment for the care and treatment of the patient's wound. The OCA-NS-1378A Class IIA Wound Management Kit integrates with a medic bag to provide recovery area safety,
