Power signal cables often carry electrical power, typically from a power distribution utility company, from a generating station, or from some other source. Very high voltages sometimes are carried by power cables. In some locations, the National Electrical Code requires that cable be used for electrical signal transmission. In other locations, if the cable has metal cores, it is specified by the electrical code to be used for electrical signal transmission. Signal Line Cable is the preferred type of cable to carry electrical signals. Although the voltage carried in signal line cables is typically much lower than the voltage carried in power cables, the cable is required to be grounded by some method. In some locations, the National Electrical Code requires that cables be protected from lightning strikes by being covered with a weatherproof enclosure. In other locations, such as most indoors, cables are assumed to be in danger of electrical damage from lightning unless they are actually covered with a weatherproof enclosure. Although signal line cables must be grounded, they need not be tied to ground. Signal line cables must have a nonconductor (typically copper) core, which carries the electrical signal. Even though most signal line cables are grounded, they are typically not protected from electrical fires caused by lightning strikes. Grounding the cable helps prevent electrical problems caused by lightning strikes by grounding the cable, but it does not prevent electrical fires caused by lightning strikes.Q: Opening a file in Vim with a specific code block I want to use Vim to open a file in a specific code block from the beginning.
