A tracked vehicle is a class of heavily armored, wheeled, tracked, or tracked-like vehicles that have a track-wheels configuration, with or without other arrangements for engine, suspension, and brake. The specialized rolling system is essential to the wheels for stability when driving on rough terrain and enhanced vehicle maneuverability. Some of the earliest examples of tracked vehicles include the development of armored tracked battle vehicles in World War I and armored tracked tank vehicles for operations and the first attempts at heavier tank construction with the T-34-type production. The design of specialized tracks and different propulsion methods also is associated with many of the terms used for tracked vehicles, like rail vehicle and track vehicle, the antitank durchgerüttetsteigertüchtigte Kraftwagen (APKW), or simply APC, and the artillery tractor. The design of tracks and their evolution can be seen as parallel to the development of two-wheeled vehicles such as bicycles. The tracks themselves have also undergone a profound evolution. The earliest development was for use as a narrow-width, heavy-duty driving platform, but became supplemented by more light weight, flexible, high-speed, articulated tracks for use as control systems for more complex tracked vehicles, and the universal drive system for manufacture of military and civilian vehicles. History of the tank track: Modern armored vehicles, with the exception of tracked assault guns, feature wheels and tracks. However, there have been many tank developments, in varying levels of success, that utilized the use of metal tracks, and a suspension to replicate how tanks were towed and with the ability to drive on its own. Some tankers take the idea as far as cross-country operation to maximize tread life and do not utilize the suspension, while other vehicle designers have added things like brake lights for aiming purposes. Traditionally, tracked vehicles have been used for warfare, such as for tank combat and armored fighting vehicle combat. Armored tracked vehicles have been used for many military applications, such as reconnaissance vehicles, tracked personnel carriers, reconnaissance vehicles, artillery tractors, and mobile assault guns. Tracked tanks have featured in numerous video games since the early days of video games. The most famous example is Pong and its sequel, where a tank appears on the top of the screen. The older titles, such as Tank Battle (also known as Tank-Battle Game), tank spin, and Tankster, also feature a tank on the screen. Many varieties of tank games and miniatures games have appeared on the

on the drug components. The conclusion yielded that the Herbal formula did not contribute to the liver regeneration and its acceleration in liver protective efficacy was only responsible for decompensated hepatitis and recovery from it. The liver cell regenerative mechanism, which is involved in the hepatoprotective activity of the PCL compound is yet to be studied. A study has shown ([@B55]) that a herbal prescription LHBP could reduce lipid peroxidation, MDA contents and increase the level of antioxidants namely, SOD and GST. The same study has further shown an increase in DNA repair in the liver tissue after LHBP administration through the suppression of poly (ADP-ribose) polymerase activity. Further studies, similar to our work may be designed to assess the role of LHBP in the liver regeneration mechanism. It was interesting to note that, LHBP at high or even medium doses had no significant influence on liver cell proliferation or hepatotoxicity and it is also evident that, as a hepatoprotective agent, the compound did not enhance liver cell regeneration. This is the first time where a compound has been studied which is simultaneously hepatoprotective and non-hepatotoxic but has the ability to stimulate liver cell regeneration, which is at the same time. The initial stage of liver cell regeneration involves the effect of growth and proliferation factors on the liver cells ([@B55]). The body of evidence available on the liver growth and proliferation in general and in the specific case of the hepatoprotection is very incomplete. This makes it quite difficult for a researcher to make an accurate conclusion on the liver cell regeneration/protection. Conclusion ========== Hepatoprotective activity of PCL compound is attributable to the presence of hepatoprotective antioxidants, plant sterols and phytosterols. Liver cell regeneration/protection of PCL compound is secondary to the presence of hepatoprotective effects. A non-hepatotoxic compound can play a vital role in the treatment of severe liver pathology. The authors appreciate and thankfully acknowledge the funding and infrastructural support provided by
