I am starting to work in some RobotC code on a robot and I find it hard to find information about a specific topic. I am trying to make a test in which my robot moves towards a specific position, then moves to left, then moves to right. I want to automate all this with robotC. I tried to do it but I can't understand how to get the points Z axis. I did: while(1) { int move; if (Button[0]==0) { move=2; robot.linearMove(move); } } But there is no documentation about the move in the robotC guide. If someone can tell me how to get the Z axis with robotC I really want to do it on robotC because I am trying to make a robot that moves continuously with some fancy pyro (simulation). A: It's not documented because it can be set to do whatever you want. You can use getPos() and setPos() to move the robot. By default, the robot is translated to the origin. Example: if (Button[0]==0) { move=2; robot.setPos(robot.getPos() + float(-move, 0, 0)); } Towards the initiation of weight-based "freshman comp" at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. For the first time, the authors of this article have established a weight-based freshman clinical experience program at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. The program is funded to allow a resident to participate in an advanced supervised clinical rotation of 6 weeks in length. An attempt is being made to create a "freshman comp" experience in which limited students are exposed to only those rotations, daily patient care, and tasks that a medical student should have experienced in a clerkship experience. After a pilot 1st-year experience, the authors developed a formal, organized plan. The following
