MVP Driven AngularJS is based on the "SOLID" practices of Object Oriented development. It attempts to create the most structured code and lay out of developer lives more efficiently and quickly. It was developed with the goal of demonstrating the power and influence of AngularJS via MVC(Model View Controller) rather than just MV(Model View) or MVVM. This is both a frontend and backend solution to large scale enterprise development with the intention of creating solutions that are maintainable and allow for a solid rollout and scaling of projects in the future. The back end is built on an LBLGen Pro generic data layer that is further decoupled from the front end using AngularJS and a M e79caf774b

I am new to iOS development and I need help with designing the following problem: I have an app that has data that is read from a server. The server returns a list of rows with a list of names (these names will appear in the list). Each item in the list should have a specific size and then have a list of contacts (this list should be customizable) that are loaded into a UITableView. The thing is that this list will be very big and changing dynamically so it cannot be loaded in the storyboard. Is there a way to place these custom cells in the storyboard and place the table view there? Also, is there a way to customize the table view headers? Thanks! A: Is there a way to place these custom cells in the storyboard and place the table view there? Yes, you can use tableView's static cells and give them an identifier. Then you can instantiate the cells in code. Is there a way to customize the table view headers? For the headers, you can do so in the storyboard, but you must set the table's view controller to have a table view of the desired custom table view class. Then set the UITableView's header view to the desired custom view or subclass.
