Effects of platelet-activating factor and its liposome on the formation of pulmonary thrombi in rats. Platelet-activating factor (PAF) induced lung and pulmonary artery platelet aggregation (PCA) in rats; it also accelerated the formation of pulmonary thrombi in vivo. Pre-treatment of the rat lungs with PAF or its liposome at the time of thrombus formation significantly increased the rate of thrombus formation. The results suggest that PAF is an essential cofactor of coagulation in the formation of pulmonary thrombi. Cervical carotid artery dissection associated with adult polycystic kidney disease. Cervical carotid artery dissection is a potentially fatal disease that often leads to stroke or death in the emergency setting. Currently, most data describing cervical carotid artery dissection come from the pediatric population. At least two factors are more prevalent in the pediatric population than adults: the large size of the aortic root and the association with renal diseases, such as hyperfiltration, crystal deposition in the juxtaglomerular apparatus, and, in the case of adult polycystic kidney disease, aneurysms of the cyst-neck junction
