Terminal boxes are designed with a specific function depending upon the types of cabling in question. For example, a HV terminal box may include a single switch for an HV cable, while a LV terminal box may include two switches for a LV cable. A HV terminal box, such as for example a SWiP (Single Wire Interface Pair) box, includes a housing, a terminal block, a power supply unit, a module, a controller, and a voltage transformer or main connector. The HV power supply unit, the module and the controller may be mounted on a common plane inside the housing. The voltage transformer is coupled to the module and the controller. A LV cable may be coupled with a terminal block in the housing of the HV terminal box. The HV terminal box may be installed in a rack, and hence the voltage transformer is coupled with the module and the controller via a cable. In such a case, the voltage transformer is usually formed by a coaxial cable. In some instances, the voltage transformer is made up of a differential wire. In either case, the voltage transformer is soldered to the module and the controller, and then the plurality of wires extending between the voltage transformer and the module and the controller are bundled and soldered to the terminal block in the housing. In a known HV terminal box, the voltage transformer may be coupled with the controller or the module using a through connection. In this case, the voltage transformer may be coupled with the controller or the module by soldering a wire thereto. Such a wire may be a part of a coaxial cable or a differential wire. We don't know exactly what to make of this bomb. There is a possibility that it is a hoax, a fair catch. It can be self-contained, do not require an intermediary to detonate, and could possibly do so without any trigger mechanism. 0cc13bf012
