When telemetry of stored data is provided for, for example, a pacemaker or implantable cardioverter defibrillator, the data transmitted is typically limited to a one way flow of data, such as diagnostic information. In this type of data transmission, the data sent from the device to the external device is displayed on the display of the external device. More recently, systems have been developed for two way data transmission from an implantable device to an external device. In such systems, a controller of the external device receives instructions and data from the implantable device. One example of such a system is the Medtronic® Diary.TM. system. An example of a system providing a two way transmission from an implantable device is the Model 9616 CardioArm.TM. system sold by Rhythms, Inc. In such two way data transmission systems, typically the external device is provided with a display and an input device which allow for transmitting of instructions to the implanted device. The input device typically includes a button for selection of an instruction and a keypad for data entry. The external device may, in this case, be provided with a telemetry receiver for receiving two way transmission of data between the external device and the implanted device. It is also known to provide a communication link for allowing bidirectional exchange of data. This is typically in the form of a radio link which allows the implanted device to communicate with a programming unit. It is also known to provide a magnetic resonance link for allowing a telemetry procedure to be established between an external device and a device implanted in a patient. A system for establishing magnetic resonance link is described in U.S. Pat. No. 6,285,958.Q: Akka Router Dead Letters I am trying to use a Dead Letter Queue using Akka Camel to send the request to a different url and log it. For example, in the 1998 release of Adobe Audition 1.0.,One of the world's most rigorous tests of a nation's integrity has been placed in the hands of the world's most prosperous and powerful nations. What we found in five years of work on The Economist's Dirty Secrets Index is that the world's biggest economies are becoming dirtier at a time when they are pumping out carbon at record rates. Our first ever ranking of 149 national economies showed that on average, the world's biggest economies are dirty, and getting dirtier. Indeed, the annual emissions intensity of GDP, a measure of a country's production of waste, has been creeping up more than it has been coming down. (Note: The index does not measure the level of dirty air from individual factories or industrial accidents. The figures, for example, tally the amount of carbon dioxide pollution produced by the average person and extrapolate that figure to give an overall reading of the size of the economy.) The first screen was "Leadership." Of the economies ranked, 86 are European and 56 are in the emerging markets, despite the fact that they generate the majority of the global economy's emissions. "Asia takes the top six spots. India is the biggest in size; China is the biggest in emissions." Brazil, Indonesia and Pakistan occupy the middle ranks. Russia, Saudi Arabia, South Africa and Turkey round out the bottom four. About half of the economies on the index
