article describes the life of Léonides Damer (1893-1973), a forgotten urologist who not only contributed to pediatric urology, but also was a part of the founding editors of the journal Pediatrics.
The author particularly emphasizes the importance of his contributions to the scientific management of pediatric urology and healthcare for children. Damer was the founder and first president of the New York Academy of Pediatrics and a member of several prominent academic and professional organizations. In a conventional credit card transaction, a vendor captures an image of a customer's credit card and transmits the captured image data to a financial institution. The financial institution confirms that the captured image data matches the customer's credit card, and completes the transaction using the customer's credit card. However, this conventional credit card transaction involves a number of manual steps. For example, a vendor is typically required to utilize a separate piece of equipment, such as a credit card scanner, to capture an image of the customer's credit card.
The captured image data is then manually forwarded to a financial institution, which then manually compares the captured image data to the customer's credit card to determine whether the captured image data is valid and/or whether the customer is authenticated. Such a conventional process is time consuming and labor intensive, and, therefore, may discourage a customer from completing a transaction at the vendor. Further, the captured image data may be intercepted and misused prior to confirmation by the financial institution. In a further conventional credit card transaction, a customer swipes a credit card through a magnetic card reader at a vendor to create a transaction request. The vendor captures an image of the customer's credit card, which is then compared to a magnetic strip or a chip on the customer's credit card using image recognition technology. If the captured image data matches the magnetic strip or chip, the captured image data is sent to a financial institution to complete the transaction. The customer does not authenticate himself to the vendor, and the vendor is not certain that the credit card that the customer swipes is the customer's credit card. Therefore, a need exists for an image recognition method and system that generates a transaction request using a merchant's magnetic
