Apple unveils new iPad Apple (NASDAQ:AAPL) launched its new iPad tablet at a media event in Cupertino, Calif. on Wednesday, going on the offensive against Android-powered tablets, which are growing in popularity with consumers who want to replace their PCs with a single device. By putting a big-screen tablet into the hands of the public, Apple has the potential to make inroads into the booming smartphone market and convince consumers to make the jump to mobile computing. Also, the new iPad is priced cheaper than competing Android devices. Apple CEO Steve Jobs told the audience: "Our goal all along has been to make a great tablet that is not a PC, and we think we have done that." Jobs referred to the new tablet as a product in its "second generation," unlike the current iPad, which is the third version of the product. The iPad was introduced with an introductory price of $499, and a cellular version will be available for free at AT&T (NYSE:T), Verizon (NYSE:VZ) and Sprint (NYSE:S). The tablet will be the biggest revenue driver for Apple, and CEO Tim Cook said he expects total iPhone sales to "increase substantially." Apple is clearly targeting Android tablets with its iPad launch. The 3-pound iPad has full-sized keyboard, unlike many of the other tablets, which are half the size of the iPad. Jobs made it clear that the iPad is not meant to be a PC replacement. "We think it is obvious that it is not a PC, and it wasn't designed to be," Jobs said. "It's not just the size, it's not just the weight, it's not just the price. It's what the keyboard does and the thing that truly makes it unique is that it is a great tablet with lots of capabilities." Android and the Apple

To examine stress vulnerability factors in an aggressive group of children, a multifaceted assessment was administered consisting of self-report questionnaires, parent-child interaction tasks, and a behavioral observation task. Based on previous research, it was hypothesized that the aggressive group would have more psychological or behavioral problems, less favorable parent-child relationships, and would be characterized by difficult temperament. The results supported these hypotheses to some degree, and support a model with interactions among these factors.Q: Implementing Runnable in android?
