• Skill SystemThe preventive effects of coenzyme Q10 on acute optic neuritis after immunization with MOG in adult rats. The aim of this study was to determine whether treatment with coenzyme Q10 (CoQ10) reduces the incidence of experimental autoimmune encephalomyelitis (EAE) and optic neuritis (ON) in rats with a peptide of the proteolipid protein (PLP) sequence 139-151 that develops after immunization with myelin oligodendrocyte glycoprotein (MOG) 35-55. Two groups (n=24) of 8-week-old female Lewis rats were immunized with MOG-35-55 and one group received CoQ10 (4.5 mg/kg, p.o.) immediately after immunization and on alternate days until sacrifice (CoQ10), while the control group was immunized with MOG alone (Control). Development of EAE was followed daily. On day 21, a laser-Doppler flowmeter (LDF) was used to measure blood flow over the optic nerve. Oligoclonal bands and pathologic studies were carried out in the optic nerve and brain. The incidence of EAE was statistically significantly lower in the CoQ10 group than in the Control group. All the animals were euthanized on day 21, but two animals from the Control group had ON and were sacrificed on day 30. On day 21, there were no differences in blood flow over the optic nerve between the groups. The data suggest that the preventive administration of CoQ10 to the MOG-immunized rats, from the day of immunization, decreases the incidence of EAE and prevents the development of ON in these animals.

Q: What is the optimal TTFB time for a good user experience? I'm trying to understand what value the max TTFB (Time to First Byte) should have for a user to make a decision to click on something (either a button, link or form). In other words, if I want my users to make a decision within a page load, what is the maximum I can set it to? What do I need to take into account? A: The first time your page is opened, there is no business benefit if the page loads immediately or later. The only time you want to have your page be delayed is if you're busy. Or the user has just set up a
