I have written a thread in ruby that takes data from a text file and does calculations with it. I want to build a form that can generate the file for processing. I am not sure if I can keep the contents of the file open while the form is open, or would I have to regenerate the file from scratch? A: A thread doesn't get any methods to do that. Ruby threads tend to allocate very little of the memory and so they are very 'thin' when it comes to memory. A thread will generally allocate a set of the memory and then there will be open file descriptors, a stack and usually other miscellaneous allocated memory. The threads won't be sharing memory, they will be completely different threads with different processes/
