In the world of online games, Roblox's creation platform makes it easy for anyone to build their own games, and the company has become the second-most-valuable company in the space with a market cap of $8.2 billion. Andrew Binstock, the company's CEO and co-founder, sat down with me to talk about how the company made the difficult decision to pivot away from the popular MOBA genre to the free-to-play creator platform. Since Andrew started working at Roblox back in 2015, the company has grown from 12 to 300 employees and made several big hires and has raised over $161 million to support the growing platform. Leading the company, Andrew has had to juggle multiple balls to keep the company growing while simultaneously navigating changes in the business. Companies develop their brands and their recognition over time, but Roblox has never had the luxury of that as its only real competition is free games. It's been a steep climb and Andrew has been forced to make some big decisions, but he's been lucky to have so many smart people around him, and the company's mission has always remained at the forefront. In this conversation, we talk about: - Leadership: what it means to lead a startup - Hiring: the importance of having a great team, and the challenges of a "recruiter-led" hiring process - How leadership and culture can improve retention - Pivot: what it's like to
