In it, the president and his ilk argue that if you outlaw guns, we will be safe from murderers.

But the truth is, the kind of laws they will likely propose only further disarm law-abiding citizens and create a future that the U.S. will be in even less control than it is now. The Facts of the Issue As published by the Gun Control Act of 1968, which was created by the law Congress passed to stop the bloodbath of 200,000 American lives being lost to Vietnam. The law was later amended to the firearm-focused National Firearms Act in 1986. The Federal Assault Weapons Ban was repealed in 2004. The U.S. has seen, on average, 300 mass killings per year, the majority of which involved firearms. So, guns kill. They are a staple of the modern world. They will be with us for a long time. And a vast majority of the time, they are used to stop mass murderers or gangsters, not in everyday protection against violent crime. The Law of Consequence The law of consequence is: Those who prepare for an attack are usually the ones who succeed. And any type of law that makes it easier to prepare for an attack is usually counterproductive. This is because it emboldens would-be attackers, as well as the greater public, to engage in similar activities. The Reason for the Gun Control Laws The National Rifle Association and supporters of gun control law frequently argue that there are times when guns prevent violence. But what they do not mention is that the only reason there are times when guns stop violence is because the weapons are legal. They are not exactly the best way to stop violence, as we've already seen in the case of gun control laws. They
