BEIJING—New reports that $1.7 trillion in hidden Chinese trade surpluses with the United States had reached a record during the just-concluded fiscal year are fueling U.S. trade tensions with Beijing and raising questions about China's foreign-exchange reserves. In addition, Chinese policymakers have long known that China's trade surplus with the U.S. totaled $355 billion last year, roughly four times as large as the official number they use to manage the economy. At the same time, however, Chinese officials didn't try to hide that data from the public. Rather, they pored over the statistics like chefs reading a menu and added, then subtracted, to arrive at the proper number. The problem is that such a procedure largely masks, rather than discloses, what happened to China's currency. A country's trade balance should be calculated based on the value of its currency. This is because a deficit in trade can mean two things: either it's a result of an artificially low exchange rate, or it's a result of a high exchange rate. Let's take a look at the trade balance numbers. U.S. Commerce Department data show that the U.S. goods trade deficit with China last year increased 60 percent to $347.2 billion. That's a heavy burden for an economy that grew 6.7 percent last year. China's exports soared 8.9 percent to a record $2.4 trillion. Its imports surged 22.7 percent to $2.8 trillion, resulting in a trade surplus of $360 billion. That's a significant leap over 2017, when the deficit with the U.S. was $287.8 billion and the surplus totaled $259.3 billion. What makes the difference even more striking is that despite surging import growth in 2018 to a record high, China's foreign exchange reserves—the ultimate tool that a central bank has to cushion a currency from big swings in market sentiment—contributed $21.2 billion to the trade balance. In other words, the massive trade surplus last year reflects the fact that China's trade surplus was extremely high because its foreign currency reserve growth was very low. The situation is not much different for this year. U.S. Commerce Department data show a trade deficit with China of $325.2 billion, while Chinese export growth so far has also exceeded that of imports. That leaves the trade surplus for 6d1f23a050
