To further explore the relationship between bipolar disorder in one parent and in the offspring, this study examined the association between maternal history of mood disorder and offspring mood disorder. Parents of 125 offspring with mood disorder (58 with bipolar disorder) completed a mood disorder questionnaire that focused on their own mood disorder, and that of their spouse and children. Relative risk ratios were calculated by family history. The data showed that, compared to offspring without a family history, offspring with a family history of mood disorder were more likely to have their own mood disorder (RRR 3.0, 95% CI = 1.7-5.3). Other psychiatric disorders were not associated with having a family history of mood disorder. These results suggest that offspring of mood-disordered mothers are at a higher risk of developing the disorder.The performance of historic buildings and monuments on the National Register of Historic Places.
