If your serial number is not being recognized there are two potential causes: Your router/modem is set to reject any attempt to create a serial number, or Your router/modem is not set to accept a serial number. Be sure your router is accepting the serial number, and that your modem is not actively blocking the attempt to create a serial number, and retry creating a serial number. If the serial number is still not being accepted, check your router and modem settings. For example, router settings that can cause this behavior include a setting to block from all source addresses, or blocking all IP addresses except those that match a certain standard. Most routers have an option to control this behavior (usually a setting on the web interface). For example, the SonicWALL ACS-Series will reject any attempt to create a serial number unless you enter your serial number into the router. These models will not accept the serial number unless your modem is set to accept the IP address of the router. I used the iPod touch to detect a 'Nexus' when I was running iOS version 6.1.3. And I then used the methods outlined in my response to Killoo to detect that I had a 'Nexus' and I used the port mapper to display the serial number I have been provided with. I downloaded the serial number to the Parallels Desktop that I use on my Macbook and that's all I had to do. The only changes I had to make to my Macbook were to get it to recognize I was using a USB keyboard and mouse. There is always the possibility that someone else on this site can provide you with a serial number for you but its very unlikely. I don't do this for commercial gain so can not share a serial number with someone else. Best to enjoy the 'Nexus' and soon see what other features this device has as I'm sure you'll love it. However, most of the above is irrelevant as you have a PC and of course can use your PC, regardless of the software you have running. I would suggest that you get yourself the ISOs as mentioned by Price Bazar and to buy a hardware USB2 1gig drive. Make sure it 6d1f23a050
