To clarify the effect of thoracic aortic cross clamping, 23 patients scheduled for coronary artery bypass grafting were given a series of four exercise tests on the day preceding surgery, together with a standard oral glucose tolerance test and an arterial blood sample for fasting plasma glucose. The exercise test was performed after the administration of 100 mg intravenous calcium chloride for the evaluation of the ischemic response to occlusion of coronary arteries. In the 23 patients, there were no significant differences between the mean arterial and plasma glucose concentrations before and after calcium chloride, between coronary perfusion and no-perfusion rates, or between the ischemic responses of different territories. These findings were not significantly different from those of the 17 control patients given exercise testing and no calcium chloride but underwent cardiac catheterization instead. With a postextrasystolic stimulus of four cycles in 20 patients, however, there was a fourfold (p less than 0.001) increase in the rate of decrease of the ST segment as compared to that in the control patients. The rate of decrease of the ST segment did not correlate to changes in either plasma glucose or lactate concentrations in the coronary sinus. The postextrasystolic electrocardiographic ST-segment response was observed after both reperfusion and no-per
