Despite its increase in abuse, the mechanism(s) by which METH produces its euphoric and rewarding effects is unknown. One possible mechanism is that METH produces changes in the presynaptic release and uptake of endogenous monoamines, including dopamine (DA). While there is evidence that METH changes DA function, the direction and magnitude of the effects are not consistent with METH's effect on DA function. Importantly, if the direction and magnitude of these effects are different than expected based on current understanding of DA pharmacology, this might suggest that METH modulates DA neuronal activity. In addition, METH has been shown to increase glutamate (Glu) levels in the ventral tegmental area (VTA) and nucleus accumbens (NAcc), which are regions important in the rewarding and locomotor effects of psychostimulants. Based on these findings, and the known ability of DA to interact with Glu signaling, it is possible that Glu changes accompany METH-induced DA changes and thereby contribute to the behavioral effects of METH. The proposed studies are a unique set of studies designed to study how METH changes DA release and uptake as well as Glu levels in the VTA and NAcc. In addition, the proposed studies are designed to determine how METH alters DA neuronal firing (Aim 1) and the relationship between DA neuronal firing, DA release and Glu levels (Aim 2). An understanding of how METH modulates these different processes in the VTA and NAcc will contribute to our understanding of METH's actions and may provide novel insight into the motivational properties of METH. PUBLIC HEALTH RELEVANCE: Methamphetamine is one of the most commonly abused drugs in the United States. Despite the increase in METH use, there are still many gaps in our knowledge of the pharmacological effects of METH. The proposed studies will help to fill this knowledge gap by studying how METH changes the function of key brain regions involved in the reward and locomotor effects of psychostimulants. 6d1f23a050
