It is well known to include a filter in the crankcase or breather system of internal combustion engines, such as marine engines. Such a filter includes a filter media filter element or housing, which is sealed on its exterior by a cylindrical metal case. At least one oil inlet orifice is located on a portion of the filter element that faces the interior surface of the metal case, and at least one oil drain orifice is located on a portion of the filter element that faces the exterior surface of the metal case. The metal case is conventionally welded or clamped to the filter element. The filter element is preferably constructed so that a large portion of the filter element is in intimate contact with the exterior surface of the metal case. This allows the oil to readily flow through the filter element. The filter element is preferably constructed so that it is capable of withstanding a substantial amount of vibration. It is known that such filtration elements are susceptible to a development of c6a93da74d
